Recent studies have suggested a correlation between the degree of similarity of a virus and human host and their susceptibility to infection.<sup>[@bibr3-1535759719845326]</sup> In this context, rapid molecular genetic testing can be applied for diagnosis and can aid in the development of prophylactic and therapeutic measures, providing an opportunity for the development of effective therapeutics with minimal side effects.<sup>[@bibr4-1535759719845326]</sup> Zhang et al investigated whether viral genetic diversity of Ebola Zaire and Ebola Sudan is related to the different clinical manifestations of Ebola infection.<sup>[@bibr5-1535759719845326]</sup> They found that different strains of the Ebola virus showed different levels of genetic similarity. From a phylogenetic analysis of the Ebola virus genomes, they concluded that Ebola virus disease (EVD) was likely not caused by a single virus strain or a single clade, but might instead be caused by a set of genetically distinct EVD strains. This means that different EVD strains could cause very similar clinical manifestations of disease due to genetic mutations. According to a subsequent study, the lack of data on the molecular makeup of EVD needs to be addressed.^[@bibr6-1535759719845326]^

Future developments in the field of Ebola therapy are expected to focus on developing therapeutics that are active against a broad range of Ebola virus strains. In addition, it is necessary to develop an understanding 3e33713323
